Pain and sedation are the major causes of dissatisfaction after surgery in children, particularly in the preschool years. Because of the significant morbidity of intravenous (IV) opioids, a need exists for the development of analgesic regimens that are rapid, well-tolerated, and effective. This study was conducted to compare the effectiveness, safety, and satisfaction of two IV anesthetic regimens, rectal meperidine (MPM) and IV morphine (M), in children younger than 6 years undergoing tonsillectomy and/or adenoidectomy with general anesthesia. One hundred children were randomized to receive either MPM or M by random assignment in a double-blinded fashion. Pain was assessed with a five-point categorical verbal rating scale. Patients were evaluated at the beginning of the procedure and at various time intervals after admission to the recovery room and the discharge home. Demographic, physiological, and operative data were collected and analyzed. One hundred eighty-one patients were enrolled and analyzed. No differences were observed between the two regimens in the amount of administered opioid; the average intramuscular morphine dose for the MPM group was 0.96 mg/kg (IQR 0.6 to 1.3), compared with 0.76 mg/kg (IQR 0.43 to 0.93) for the M group. The average time to request a pain medication in the recovery room was 22 minutes for the MPM group, compared with 24 minutes for the M group. No
